

Love your family dearly, and make time for one another. Treasure the ordinary days, the familiar voices, and the moments that seem so small at the time.

Enjoy your youth while it is yours, cherish your health while you have it, and do not let the years pass without making memories with those you love.

A hundred years have taught me that time passes far more quickly than we imagine. The days we once thought would last forever become memories, which is why we must cherish the people we love while we have them beside us.

And when you reach the end of your own long journey, may you look back with a grateful heart, remembering a life made beautiful by the people you loved.
